Leader's Instructions:

1. Lay a rope directly on the floor. Stretch it out in a straight line, or place it in any number of twists and turns.
2. Have children remove their shoes to increase tactile stimulation. Children can then walk the rope as if it were a tightrope. (Rope walking is a good large-muscle activity for 2 and 3 year olds. It helps improve balance while exploring the concepts of over, under, across and through.)
3. As abilities increase, encourage the children to walk sideways on the rope or even backward. You can finally place small objects along the rope for stepping over.

Uses:

1. Use this activity to travel to the mission field, arriving at the spot where you tell the weekly Missions Story. Constantly review the basic concept that missionaries go to others, near or far.
2. When children have good enough balance that there is not much chance of falling with hands full, give each child a Bible, a picture of Jesus, or some other item of your choosing. They can walk the rope and pretend to take that item to another part of the world, or to another child.
3. Place obstacles on the rope that a missionary has to overcome (or step over) to take the gospel to another person. You might have to step quietly over a stuffed lion or elephant, in order not to be chased. A pillow can be a mountain to climb over. A blue pillowcase becomes a lake to be rowed across, and two chairs become canyon walls to squeeze between. How about a box, open at both ends that's an imaginary tunnel to crawl through? Possibilities are endless! Use your creativity. Kids love to take this path to Missions Story Time or enjoy it as an activity alone to learn that missionaries go to others.

Craft 1

Footprint Frieze

1. Stretch a long roll of paper across the classroom floor. Along the top write Missionaries Go to Others.
2. Have helpers assist children to line up on the paper and draw outlines around their bare feet, or shoes. Talk about these basic concepts as you work together:
  - missionaries go to others to tell them about Jesus
  - missionaries go near and far
  - each of us should go tell someone else about Jesus
3. Add each child's name while they color in their own footprints. (If you have LOTS of helpers, or do this at home, saturate sponges with tempura paint. Place them in shallow pans and let children step onto the sponge and out onto the paper, walking until the color runs out. Then lift them up and to the sink, or pan of clear water, for washing up.)
4. If you have pictures of missionaries that your church, class or family supports, add them to the frieze along with name and place of service. The written part is more for teachers than pre-readers of course, but they'll recognize faces quickly and some will learn to read before anyone expects!
5. Hang the completed project on the classroom wall as a reusable teaching tool, emphasizing that missionaries go to others to tell them about Jesus.
6. On a smaller scale, do this project on single sheets of paper and let children take the project home. After all, wouldn't it look great on a refrigerator door?

Discussion and Application

1. What do missionaries do? (Missionaries go to others.)
2. Why do they go to others? (To tell them about Jesus.)
3. Can you go to others and tell them about Jesus? (Yes, and kids will most likely name a few people. That's great!)
4. Where do missionaries go? (They go next door and they go to faraway places around the world.)

Notes:

Craft 2

Put children into the missions picture, literally!

Supplies needed: paper, tape, overhead projector, crayons

1. Set the overhead projector directly on the floor. Project the included overhead onto 3 x 4 ft. chunks of paper, which you've taped to the wall. (Each child has his/her own piece of paper.)
2. First, trace the title and the world. The continents don't have to be perfectly detailed. Rough approximations will do just fine. Use blue and green colors, if you like, or just black outlines.
3. Then, one by one, have children pose in a walking position between the projector and their paper, casting a silhouette shadow on the world. Trace around the child.
4. Let children color in their body silhouettes with black, or another dark color.
5. Add names and you have a personalized daily reminder that each of us can go tell others!

(It saves time and wiggles to trace the world and lettering on paper before class. Have older student helpers do this artwork if you are pressed for time.)

Alternative Uses:

1. Since everyone loves to play shadow puppets, use this to make missionary songs extra-fun. Project the overhead onto the wall. Link children hand-in-hand for a paper doll chain effect, while singing "Jesus Loves the Little Children." Other missions songs work well, too, like the second verse to "Stop and Let Me Tell You." As you sing "Go and tell the nations . . ." let children march single file between the projector and wall to cast their own shadow on the world.
2. Construct a super-sized world by taping many sheets of paper together on the wall. Line the children up for individual silhouettes that span the globe. After it's been up in your room long enough, cut the world into strips and send each child home with his/her own silhouette and territory.
3. Do only face silhouettes on the world, instead of full bodies. Use construction or typing paper for this smaller project.

I can go tell someone in the world about Jesus!
